

THERAPY OF SECRETS

karma aryani

AI BOOK MAKER

Therapy of Secrets

by

karma aryani

COPYRIGHT

Text copyright © 2026 karma ariyani. All rights reserved.

No part of this publication may be reproduced, distributed, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means without prior written permission of the publisher, except for brief quotations used in reviews or educational settings as permitted by copyright law.

Therapy of Secrets

Written by karma ariyani

Published by karma ariyani Books

First Edition · August 18, 2026

Prepared for professional print and digital publishing workflows, including Amazon KDP. The author is responsible for final review, approval, and publication.

The Ghost in the Consulting Room

The city was a sprawling beast of glass and concrete, shimmering beneath a haze of exhaust, heat, and ambition. From a distance, its towers looked almost weightless, their mirrored faces catching the afternoon sun and throwing it back in fractured flashes. At street level, however, everything felt heavier. Traffic crawled through avenues clogged with buses and black sedans. Sirens rose and faded between the buildings. Vendors shouted beneath awnings stained by rain and pollution, while above them, behind tinted windows and guarded doors, fortunes were made, concealed, and quietly destroyed.

In a quiet office building that had long since seen better days, Dr. Aris Thorne sat among the ghosts of his own making.

Dust drifted through the weak afternoon light, settling over his worn armchair, neglected psychology texts, and the framed photograph on his desk—a smiling young girl with bright eyes and an open, fearless expression. The frame was inexpensive, its wooden edge nicked at one corner, but Aris had never replaced it. He had moved it from office to office, apartment to apartment, carrying it with the same grim care another man might reserve for a relic.

Elara.

His daughter.

Gone for six years without a word, a clue, or the smallest mercy of silence.

Her absence had hardened inside him, turning every breath into an act of will. There were mornings when he woke convinced that the phone would ring before he could sit up. There were nights when a car slowing outside the building sent him to the window before reason returned. Each time, hope arrived first, bright and involuntary. Each time, it left him more diminished.

He had learned not to speak her name aloud when strangers were present. The name changed people. It made them lower their voices, tilt their heads, and search his face for the proper expression of sympathy. Some offered condolences as though Elara were dead. Others asked questions with the careful curiosity of those who had never experienced a grief without a body, a funeral, or a final answer.

Aris had no use for either kind of kindness.

Once, Aris Thorne had been a luminary in forensic psychology, a scholar whose assessments were cited in courtrooms and whose lectures drew investigators, attorneys, and ambitious young clinicians from across the region. He had possessed a reputation for seeing patterns where others saw chaos. Criminals lied, witnesses misremembered, institutions protected themselves—but beneath the noise, he believed, there was always a structure waiting to be found.

That belief had made him valuable.

It had also made him vulnerable.

Now his practice had dwindled to a few pro bono cases and the occasional consultation requiring his unnerving insight into the criminal mind. His name still appeared in old articles, sometimes attached to words like brilliant, pioneering, or controversial. More recent accounts favored less generous language. Reckless. Unstable. Compromised.

His reputation, like his heart, had fractured.

Elara's disappearance had taken more than his child. It had stripped away his standing, his marriage, and the confidence of colleagues who had once trusted his judgment. In the months after she vanished, he had searched with a ferocity that frightened even the people trying to help him. He had followed false sightings across three counties, reviewed police reports until the language blurred, and constructed theories that collapsed beneath their own weight.

His professional instincts had become a disease. Every coincidence turned into a clue. Every stranger seemed capable of concealment. He saw shadows where others saw solutions, and eventually the people around him began to wonder whether grief had made him incapable of distinguishing the two.

He lifted a chipped mug. Cold coffee shifted inside it, bitter and familiar. A dark stain marked the rim where he had forgotten to wash it the previous evening. He took a swallow anyway, welcoming the unpleasantness. It was easier to endure a known bitterness than the blankness that waited whenever his mind was left unoccupied.

He had spent the morning dissecting a legal brief for a young man falsely accused of arson—a distraction to keep his formidable intellect from going still. The boy's case was built on circumstantial evidence, a frightened witness, and a timeline no one had bothered to test properly. Aris had marked the margins in red, circling contradictions and noting the questions the prosecution had failed to ask.

It was work that required precision. Work with boundaries.

But logic could not silence the echo of Elara's laughter or erase the image of her empty bed.

The image had never faded. In memory, the room remained precisely as it had been that morning: the curtains half-open, a pale strip of sun across the floor, a paperback facedown beside the pillow. Her blue sweater hung from the back of a chair. One shoe lay beneath the bed, as though she had been in a hurry. Aris had spent six years resisting the impulse to move anything.

A sharp knock startled him.

The sound struck with such force that his hand tightened around the mug. Coffee trembled against the chipped ceramic. For one irrational second, he expected the door to open and Elara to step inside, older but recognizable, apologetic for the years between them.

Through the frosted glass, a tall, broad-shouldered silhouette waited in the corridor.

“Come in,” Aris called.

The door opened, revealing Detective Harding, a man known for pursuing justice with relentless determination, often in defiance of the city’s politically minded police brass. Harding had the thick, weathered build of someone who spent more time moving through difficult places than sitting behind a desk. His coat was damp at the shoulders, though no rain had yet begun. He carried the smell of cold air, traffic, and the metallic corridors of police headquarters with him.

Weariness had etched deep lines into his face, mirroring Aris’s own exhaustion, though Harding’s came from daily contact with the city’s violence rather than a private grief that refused to loosen its grip. His eyes were alert despite the fatigue. They moved once around the office—the books, the files, the photograph—before returning to Aris.

“Dr. Thorne,” Harding said, briefly displaying his badge. “Apologies for the unannounced visit. I wouldn’t bother you if it weren’t urgent.”

Aris gestured toward the chair opposite his desk. The upholstery had split along one arm, exposing a thin line of yellow foam. "Urgent for whom, Detective? I retired from the spectacle of criminal profiling years ago."

"You retired from public work." Harding lowered himself into the chair. "That isn't the same thing."

"I no longer appear in court. I no longer advise the department. I no longer offer opinions to reporters who have already decided what they want me to say."

"I'm not here for an opinion."

"That would make you the first person in this building to manage it."

Harding ignored the remark. He leaned forward, resting his forearms against his knees. "This isn't about profiling. Not yet."

The qualification unsettled Aris more than a direct request would have. He set the mug beside the legal brief and folded his hands over the edge of the desk.

"It concerns three incidents within the last month," Harding continued. "All the victims were prominent figures in the city's social and financial circles."

He paused, measuring the silence.

"And every one of them was, at some point, your patient."

The words settled between them like something heavy and suffocating.

For a moment, Aris heard only the building's old ventilation system rattling behind the wall. Somewhere on the floor below, a door slammed. The ordinary sounds seemed to recede, leaving Harding's statement suspended in the stale air.

"My patients?" Aris repeated.

Harding nodded.

"That's impossible."

"I'm aware of what the records say."

"Client confidentiality is absolute."

"Not for this killer."

The answer came too quickly. Harding had rehearsed it, or had repeated it often enough to believe it. Aris studied him, searching for the point where duty ended and suspicion began.

Over the years, Aris had treated hundreds of the city's troubled elite. Politicians with private compulsions. Executives whose marriages were collapsing behind charitable foundations and magazine profiles. Heirs whose addictions were disguised as eccentricity until the consequences became impossible to purchase away. Each had entrusted him with secrets hidden from everyone else.

Some had spoken because they feared exposure. Some because they feared themselves. Others had entered his office convinced that wealth, influence, or cultivated charm had made them unreadable, only to discover that the mind kept its own account of every evasion.

Confidentiality was the foundation of his profession. The law protected it; his conscience guarded it more fiercely still.

If his patients could not speak without fear that their words would be turned against them, therapy became another form of interrogation. Aris had built his career on that distinction. He had defended it in lecture halls, courtrooms, and private disputes with powerful men who believed every locked door existed for them to open.

He could not accept that someone had crossed it so completely.

“Tell me their names,” he said.

Harding drew a folded newspaper clipping from his jacket and slid it across the desk.

Aris did not touch it at first. The paper was creased several times, the ink smudged along one edge. The headline occupied nearly half the page.

CITY ELITE’S DARKEST SECRETS EXPOSED IN BRUTAL MURDER

Beneath it was a blurred photograph of a lavish penthouse. The image showed a wall of windows overlooking the city, a white sofa turned on its side, and a dark shape near the polished marble floor. The newspaper had obscured the worst of the scene, but not enough to make it seem distant.

Aris picked up the clipping. His fingers trembled almost imperceptibly.

The article described the murder of Julian Vance, a high-flying real-estate mogul whose name appeared on development projects, political donations, and the foundations of several luxury towers. Vance had cultivated the kind of public identity that suggested control at all times: tailored suits, measured statements, a family photographed at charity galas beneath chandeliers.

Yet the killing itself was not what held Aris's attention.

The report detailed intimate revelations discovered at the scene—information that could have come only from Vance's therapy sessions, or from someone with direct access to the records. The article referred to a concealed gambling addiction, debts hidden through intermediaries, and an offshore account maintained beyond the knowledge of Vance's family and business partners.

Aris remembered him vividly.

Julian Vance had sat in the chair opposite Aris with his ankles crossed and his hands folded over his stomach, presenting himself as a man inconvenienced by anxiety rather than consumed by it. He had spoken about risk as though it were a private language. At first he denied gambling. Later he described it as an occasional indulgence. Eventually, after several sessions in which his denials became less elaborate, he admitted that the games were the only moments when he felt the future could still surprise him.

He had not wanted to lose money.

He had wanted to lose certainty.

Aris lowered the clipping. "These are highly sensitive."

"That's putting it mildly," Harding said.

"Where were they found?"

"Some at the scene. Some were posted online before the police arrived. The rest were sent anonymously to two tabloids and a financial reporter."

"By whom?"

"We don't know."

"Was Vance murdered before or after the material was released?"

Harding's expression tightened. "Before, as far as we can determine. But the sequence may not matter to the person responsible."

Aris looked again at the photograph. "The police believe the killer wrote this?"

"We believe the killer wanted it found."

A pulse began beating behind Aris's right eye. He folded the clipping along its existing crease, then unfolded it again.

"The other victims," he said.

"Eleanor Holloway and Marcus Bell. Same method. Different locations. Their deepest secrets were posted online and sent anonymously to the tabloids. Details known only to a therapist—or someone with direct access to their records."

Eleanor Holloway had been a patron of museums, hospitals, and political campaigns. Aris remembered her as elegant and brittle, a woman who had spent years constructing a life that could withstand public inspection. She had come to him after an incident she refused to describe as a breakdown. Marcus Bell had been younger, though his face had carried the exhausted severity of a much older man. He had feared the consequences of one private obsession becoming known to the people who depended on his reputation.

Aris had not thought of either patient in years.

Now their names returned with terrible clarity, attached not to their sessions but to photographs, headlines, and the cold language of police reports.

"A coincidence," Aris said, though the word sounded weak even to him.

Harding gave him a look that contained neither agreement nor pity. "Three murders in thirty days. Three people with confidential histories exposed. Three names connected to your practice."

"Connected how?"

"Your name has surfaced in all three cases. Discreetly, but it's there."

Aris felt the room contract around him.

"What does that mean?"

"It means someone has made certain the investigators know you treated them."

"Were my files taken?"

"We're still checking."

"That is not an answer."

"It's the answer I have."

Aris rose so abruptly that the chair behind him scraped the floor. He crossed to the filing cabinet along the far wall, his steps quickening as he passed from one familiar object to the next. The cabinet was steel, painted a dull gray that had begun to blister near the lock. Behind it were years of notes, assessment forms, intake summaries, and handwritten observations. Most files had been sealed, archived, or destroyed according to professional and legal requirements.

But not all.

He had secured the remaining records with every safeguard available, both digital and physical. The electronic files were encrypted. The paper records were divided between locked cabinets and an off-site storage facility known only to him and one former assistant who had left the practice years ago.

At least, he believed it was known only to them.

He stood before the cabinet without opening it.

The thought that someone had breached his files, then turned them into weapons, violated something deeper than privacy. It was an assault on the trust he had spent decades building. Every confession he had received now seemed to echo inside the metal drawers. Every patient who had lowered their voice, every hand that had shaken across from him, every secret spoken in the belief that it would remain contained—someone had gathered those fragments and sharpened them into instruments.

Harding watched him. "You think someone is targeting your former patients?"

Aris turned. "You said they were mine."

"I said they had been your patients. There's a distinction."

"Not to the killer."

"No." Harding's gaze moved briefly to the photograph on the desk. "Maybe not."

The observation was casual enough to be deniable, but Aris noticed it. Harding had seen Elara's photograph. He had seen the way Aris had looked at it before the conversation began. Detectives collected details instinctively. They filed them away, even when they pretended not to.

"You came here because you think I'm involved," Aris said.

"I came because I think you may understand what we're looking at."

"That is different."

"For now."

"For now," Aris repeated.

Harding stood and walked to the desk. He did not touch the photograph, though his shadow fell across it, darkening the girl's face.

"Whoever is doing this understands psychological vulnerability," he said. "They know how to turn confession into condemnation. They aren't just killing people. They're arranging the deaths so the secrets become part of the scene."

"An exhibition."

“Maybe.”

“Or a warning.”

“Maybe that too.”

Aris looked toward the windows. Beyond the glass, the city had begun to darken. The towers were lighting up one floor at a time, thousands of rooms blooming with artificial life. From this height, the traffic had become a continuous ribbon of red and white. The vast sprawl, moments ago merely oppressive, now appeared openly menacing, as if every illuminated window concealed a witness who had chosen not to speak.

“What exactly was released about Holloway?” he asked.

Harding hesitated. “A long-term affair. Financial coercion involving a member of her family. A statement about what she believed would happen if her public image collapsed.”

“Was that statement taken from one of my sessions?”

“We think so.”

“Think?”

“The language matches your notes.”

Aris stared at him. “You’ve read my notes?”

“Not all of them.”

“That isn’t reassuring.”

“I’m not trying to reassure you.”

The bluntness landed harder than an accusation. Aris turned away, his attention drawn once more to Elara’s photograph. Her smile remained innocent, untouched by the shadows consuming her father's life. She had been eleven when she disappeared—old enough to understand that adults lied, too young to know which lies were dangerous.

Her disappearance had already destroyed his belief that anything could be kept safe. Not a child. Not a family. Not a career built on discipline and trust. Now that same vulnerability was being exploited in the lives of those who had placed their secrets in his care.

For six years, he had tried to separate the two worlds: the professional world of evidence, motive, and behavior, and the private world of unanswered grief. He had told himself that Elara's case belonged to the past, even as the past continued to occupy every room in his mind.

But standing in the dim office with Harding's questions pressing against him, he felt the old boundary begin to dissolve.

The killer knew his former patients.

The killer knew their hidden lives.

And somehow, the killer wanted Aris to know that they knew him as well.

A faint vibration came from the desk.

Aris looked down. His phone lay beside the legal brief, its screen glowing with a new message from an unknown number.

Harding noticed the change in his face. "What is it?"

Aris did not answer immediately.

The message contained no greeting, no explanation, and no signature. Only a single line of text.

YOU SHOULD HAVE LISTENED MORE CAREFULLY.

Beneath it was an attachment.

Aris stared at the small image without opening it. His first thought was that it would show one of the murdered patients. His second was that it would show a page from a therapy file.

His third thought stopped the breath in his lungs.

It might show Elara.

The boundary between patient and prey, confidant and victim, had been terrifyingly erased. The old machinery of fear had begun to move again, dragging hidden histories into the light and fastening them to bodies.

And Dr. Aris Thorne—the disgraced psychologist who had spent six years trying to escape the world of criminal minds—felt himself being pulled back into it.

Not by ambition. Not by redemption. Not even by the promise of justice.

He was being pulled back because someone had found the one wound he had never managed to close and had placed a hand inside it.

A world where the secrets he had once protected were no longer private burdens.

They were instruments of death.

Whispers from the Grave

The metallic taste of fear, long forgotten, returned to Aris's mouth. Harding's words, "Your name came up in all three cases," echoed in the sudden silence of the consulting room. It wasn't just the murders that chilled him, but the chilling precision of the killer's method: weaponizing intimacy, turning the sanctity of the therapeutic relationship into a public spectacle of shame.

"This is an unprecedented violation," Aris finally said, his voice strained. "HIPAA regulations, patient-doctor privilege - these are not merely legal frameworks, Detective. They are the ethical bedrock of our profession. To expose these confessions... it's monstrous."

Harding merely grunted, a pragmatic response to Aris's academic outrage. "Monstrous or not, it's happening. And we're at a dead end. No forced entry, no obvious connections between the victims beyond their shared therapist. Their secrets, however, are now common knowledge. The internet is having a field day." He paused, his gaze hardening. "We need your help, Doctor. You knew these people better than anyone, at their most vulnerable."

Aris recoiled, a visceral reaction. "My help? Detective, I haven't actively practiced forensic psychology in years. And even if I had, I cannot, under any circumstances, divulge patient information. It would be a betrayal, even in death." The thought of betraying the trust placed in him, even by those no longer able to suffer the consequences, was anathema to his very being.

"We're not asking you to divulge anything for public consumption," Harding clarified, his tone softening slightly. "We're asking for your insight. Your understanding of their psyche. Anything that might give us a lead, a motive, a connection that isn't immediately obvious. Think of it as a consultation, off the record. The alternative is this killer continues to operate, and who knows who they'll target next."

The implication hung heavy in the air. Who would be next? Another of his former patients? The thought sent a fresh wave of dread through Aris. His mind, rusty from disuse in the criminal sphere, began to turn over the possibilities. Was this a disgruntled former employee? A rival? Or something far more sinister, a personal vendetta against him, perhaps, using his patients as pawns?

"I can't access their files without a court order," Aris stated, almost to himself. "And even then, the scope would be limited. The sheer volume of material..."

"We're working on the court orders," Harding assured him. "But even with them, it's a haystack. We need someone who knows what to look for, someone who understands the whispers between the lines." He leaned back, his eyes narrowing. "Or someone who might have a personal stake in stopping this. Someone who knows what it's like to have their life, their past, weaponized against them."

The veiled reference to Elara was a carefully aimed dart, striking its mark. Aris flinched, his jaw tightening. Harding was good. He knew how to push the right buttons, how to exploit the personal torment that had become Aris's constant companion. The memory of Elara, her bright eyes, her innocent curiosity, flashed before him. What if this killer wasn't just targeting patients, but targeting him, through them? What if this was somehow connected to her disappearance? The thought, though terrifying, ignited a spark of cold fury within him.

"You believe this could be connected to... Elara?" Aris asked, the name catching in his throat. He hadn't spoken it aloud in a police context in years.

Harding hesitated, choosing his words carefully. "It's a long shot, Doctor. But a killer who exposes secrets, who thrives on public humiliation... it's a specific kind of malice. And your past, your personal tragedy, it's hardly a secret. If someone wanted to hurt you, to truly make you suffer, they'd go after what matters to you. Or, perhaps, they'd use what already hurts you."

The chilling logic resonated with Aris's own understanding of psychopathy. The killer wasn't just murdering; they were systematically dismantling the victims' legacies, their reputations, their very identities. It was psychological warfare, executed with brutal physical force.

Aris stood, walking to the window overlooking the gray cityscape. The city, usually a source of detached observation for him, now felt like a predator, its hidden corners harboring unseen threats. He thought of Julian Vance, the real estate mogul, whose carefully constructed empire was now collapsing under the weight of posthumous scandal. Eleanor Holloway, the philanthropic socialite, exposed as a ruthless corporate raider in her youth. Marcus Bell, the esteemed judge, whose private addiction to painkillers was now public fodder. The sheer audacity, the intricate planning.

"This person has an agenda beyond simple murder," Aris mused aloud, his mind already shifting, the academic curiosity overriding the personal pain, for a moment. "They're not just taking lives; they're destroying reputations, rewriting histories. This isn't random. There's a message here, a twisted form of justice, perhaps."

"That's what we need you to help us decipher," Harding said, rising from the chair. "Their motive, their message. The police can chase evidence, Doctor. But you... you can chase the mind." He pulled a card from his pocket. "Call me when you've decided. The longer we wait, the more whispers from the grave there'll be."

Harding left, leaving Aris alone once more with the silence, the dust, and the ghosts. But now, among the echoes of Elara's laughter, were the new, unsettling whispers of his former patients, their secrets now laid bare, demanding answers. The reluctance was still there, a heavy cloak of grief and self-imposed isolation. But beneath it, a dormant forensic mind, honed by years of sifting through the detritus of human pathology, was beginning to stir. The killer had drawn him in, not with threats, but with a challenge to his very professional and personal ethics. And Aris, though broken, was still a psychologist. And this was a mind game he couldn't afford to lose. Not when the stakes were so chillingly personal.

Therapy of Shadows

A technician emerged from the adjoining study, carrying a transparent evidence sleeve. “Doctor. Detective. You should examine this.”

Inside lay a narrow strip of paper, torn from a printer’s output tray. Three words had been typed across it in precise capital letters:

THERAPY IS LISTENING.

Aris examined the phrase. “Where was it found?”

“Beneath the printer in the study. No blood. No usable fingerprints. It may have been planted.”

“May have been?”

The technician gestured toward the machine. “The printer was used after the estimated time of death. We’re retrieving the print queue and network logs now.”

Harding’s expression hardened. “Can we determine what was printed?”

“If the killer was careless.”

Aris looked at the message again. It was not a confession. It was an invitation. The words possessed the cold simplicity of a diagnostic label—devoid of judgment, yet rendered more ominous by that very neutrality.

Therapy was listening. Therapy remembered. Therapy could be compelled to speak.

His attention shifted to the laptop. Vance's gambling account remained open, the screen frozen on a ledger of wagers and losses. Beneath it, faintly reflected in the dark glass, another window had appeared: an email client. A single message waited in the drafts folder.

Aris moved closer.

The subject line read:

ELARA.

For an instant, the room seemed to contract around him. The name belonged to a life he had spent seven years sealing behind professional language and meticulously maintained silence.

Harding observed the change in his face. "What is it?"

"I don't know."

"Then open it."

Aris hesitated. The draft contained no message, only an attachment. Its filename was a sequence of numbers followed by a date.

He recognized the date immediately.

The day Elara disappeared.

Harding summoned the digital-forensics team, but Aris had already reached toward the laptop, his gloved hand suspended above the trackpad. The killer had exposed Vance's secrets, but this was something else. This was not humiliation.

It was a summons.

And somewhere beyond the penthouse walls, someone was waiting to discover whether he would answer.

CHAPTER FOUR

The First Lie We Tell

The strip of paper remained inside its evidence sleeve, bright and narrow beneath the study's weak afternoon light.

THERAPY IS LISTENING.

Aris looked from the words to the printer beneath them. Its plastic casing was gray with dust, one corner scuffed where a chair—or a hurried shoe—had struck it. The machine sat beside Vance's desk, connected to a computer that had already been removed by the technicians. A green light blinked on the network hub. Once. Twice. Then darkness.

"Can it tell us who used it?" Harding asked.

"Printers don't remember intentions," Aris said.

"People do."

"Not reliably."

Harding's gaze settled on him. "You keep saying that like it's a professional principle."

"It is."

The detective took out his phone. "The lab's sending someone back."

"Good."

"You're coming with me."

Aris turned toward the frosted glass separating the study from the corridor. Beyond it, a figure shifted—only a silhouette, head bent, shoulders broad beneath a plastic evidence coat. For a second the shape reminded him of the yellow raincoat Elara had worn on the last morning he saw her. The resemblance was absurd. The room was too warm. The coat had been blue.

His fingers tightened around the edge of the desk.

“I’m not part of your investigation,” he said.

“You’re the reason we know the phrase matters.”

“No. The phrase is the reason you know the phrase matters.”

Harding’s phone vibrated. He glanced at the screen and frowned.

“What?”

“Vance’s office manager says the printer was connected to the building network. The queue may still be on the server.” He slipped the phone away.

“You understand networks?”

“I understand patterns.”

“That’ll have to do.”

The building’s server room occupied a locked closet at the end of the corridor, beside a vending machine humming over a carpet stained with old coffee. A technician in a navy jacket opened the door and crouched before a rack of equipment. Cold air spilled over his shoes. Aris watched the lights pulse across the machines, precise and indifferent.

“Local queue is mostly gone,” the technician said. “But there’s a spool record.”

“Mostly?” Harding asked.

“One document was released at 2:17 p.m. yesterday. Printed at 2:19. The user account belonged to Vance.”

“Vance was dead by then,” Harding said.

The technician lifted one shoulder. “Then somebody had his credentials.”

“Can you identify the device?”

“I can identify the workstation that sent the job. Not the person sitting at it.”

“Which workstation?”

The technician pointed to a line of characters on the monitor. “Vance’s desktop.”

Aris stared at the timestamp.

Two seventeen.

The medical examiner had placed Vance’s death between one and two. The difference was small enough to be dismissed, and exact enough to be dangerous. A body could be misjudged. A printer queue could be altered. Either way, someone had needed the room after Vance stopped breathing.

“What was printed?” Aris asked.

The technician glanced at Harding.

“Protected information,” Harding said. “We have a warrant.”

“That’s not what I meant.” Aris stepped closer.
“The file name.”

The technician typed, paused, and frowned.

“Nothing useful. Twelve characters. No extension.”

“Read it.”

He did. “ELARA.”

The word entered the room like a change in pressure.

Aris’s hand moved toward the server rack and stopped before touching it. His breathing narrowed. Somewhere in the building, an elevator bell chimed, followed by the muffled rush of doors opening and closing. He saw a white envelope on his own hall table, saw Elara’s school keys beside it, saw the unfinished glass of orange juice turning warm in the kitchen.

Harding was looking at him.

“You know what it means?”

“No.”

The answer came too quickly.

The technician clicked again. “There’s an attachment. Dated.”

“Open it,” Harding said.

“Not here.”

“Why?”

“Because this is an active server, and the file may be evidence. I need to make a forensic image first.”

Aris's gaze remained on the screen. "What date?"

The technician hesitated.

"Doctor," Harding said.

"August fourteenth," the technician replied.
"Twenty-ten."

For eleven years, Aris had kept that date out of conversation. It was the date Elara disappeared. The date the city had begun treating a child as a case file, then as a cold case, then as a silence no one had the obligation to disturb.

The printer light blinked behind them.

Once.

Twice.

Aris turned.

Nothing emerged from the tray.

Harding noticed. "What?"

"Nothing."

The detective crossed the corridor and checked the machine. "You saw something?"

"I heard it."

"You heard a printer breathe?"

Aris did not answer. The first lie he told himself had been simple: Elara would come home before dark. The second had been more useful—that facts, properly arranged, could protect him from what they meant.

Behind the server-room glass, the technician called for Harding. A moment later, the detective's phone rang. He stepped away to take it, speaking in a low, clipped voice. Aris watched his reflection fracture in the dark monitor beside the printer.

On the desk, Vance's computer had left behind a shallow rectangle of clean wood where a file box had rested. Dust gathered around it like a boundary. Aris ran his eyes over the room: the locked cabinet, the empty chair, the framed certificate tilted slightly toward the wall.

Then his own phone vibrated.

No number appeared. Only a notification from an encrypted mail application he had not opened in months.

One new message.

The subject line was blank.

The body contained a single sentence:

THE FIRST LIE WE TELL IS THAT WE ARE SAFE.

Beneath it sat an attachment named 08-14-10.

Aris's thumb hovered over the screen. For a moment he could not move. The muscles in his hand had forgotten their purpose. When the phone slipped, it struck the desk with a hard crack.

Harding turned. "What happened?"

Aris picked it up.

The attachment icon was gray. No preview. No indication of what waited inside.

"Nothing," he said.

Harding's expression sharpened. "You look like you've seen a ghost."

"I'm tired."

“That’s not an answer.”

“No,” Aris said, forcing the phone into his coat pocket. “It’s an observation.”

Harding came toward him. “Did you receive something?”

Aris looked at the detective’s open hand, then at the printer, then at the strip sealed beneath plastic. The killer had chosen a phrase about listening and sent a file bearing Elara’s date. It was not a message meant for the police. It was an incision made specifically for him.

He could give Harding the phone. He could let the investigation take the attachment, preserve it, interpret it. That was the lawful answer. The safe answer.

But safety was the first lie.

“I need to check something,” Aris said.

Harding’s hand closed slowly. “You’re not leaving.”

“I didn’t say I was.”

“Then tell me what came through.”

Aris met his eyes. “The printer sent another job.”

It was not true. Not entirely. The printer had sent nothing.

Harding held his stare long enough to make the lie visible between them. Then the detective’s phone rang again, dragging his attention away. He answered with a curse and moved toward the corridor.

Aris took out his own phone and opened the message.

The attachment downloaded without a password.

A map appeared: the old municipal archives beneath the courthouse, a place scheduled for demolition and largely empty after sunset. At the bottom of the screen, another line appeared.

COME ALONE, DOCTOR.

Aris read it twice.

Then he deleted the message—not the attachment, only the message—and placed the phone back in his pocket. His pulse had steadied. The room had regained its edges.

Harding returned. “We have a problem. The network logs show someone accessed Vance’s account from outside the building after the murder.”

“When?”

“Two seventeen.”

Aris looked at the printer.

The machine’s green light came on again.

This time, a single white page slid into the tray.

He reached it before Harding could.

There was no text. Only a black circle in the center of the page, perfectly printed, perfectly empty.

Aris folded it once and handed it to the detective.

“I’m coming with you,” Harding said.

Aris watched the silhouette behind the frosted glass vanish down the corridor.

“No,” he replied. “You’re following me.”

The Printer Remembered What Vance Forgot: The 2:17 p.m. release and 2:19 p.m. print were not forged and did not require anyone to enter Vance’s study. Vance had configured the printer to hold a document until a delayed security condition was met, meaning the job was created before his death but released afterward. The document is a sealed therapy summary containing a reference to Elara under an alias. The killer did not hack the system; they discovered Vance’s private fail-safe and manipulated him into creating it.

The Attachment That Wasn’t About Elara: After creating a forensic image of the active server, Thorne opens the dated ELARA attachment and discovers that it contains no photograph, confession, or ransom demand. It is a coded index of former patients whose secrets were used in the murders. Elara’s name is the encryption key because Vance had once asked her, before her disappearance, to help organize a private archive of abuse allegations involving influential city officials. The revelation suggests Elara may have vanished while exposing the same network now weaponizing therapy records—but it also proves someone has been editing the archive for years.

CHAPTER FIVE

The 2:19 File

The printer records remained open on the monitor, a narrow column of timestamps beneath the heading VANCE-STUDY-04.

2:17 p.m.—release command issued.

2:19 p.m.—document printed.

Vance's estimated time of death began at 1:50.

Aris leaned closer. The server room's air was cold enough to tighten the skin on his hands. Behind him, racks of equipment blinked in disciplined rows, green and amber lights pulsing like distant signals through fog. Detective Harding stood near the door with his arms folded, watching the reflection of the screen in the dark glass.

"Could be a bad clock," Harding said.

"Two minutes?"

"Could be a bad clock and a bad record."

Aris looked at the printer log again. "The machine recorded two separate actions. Release and print. They're not the same event."

Harding's jaw shifted. "Explain it without giving me a lecture."

"Someone sent a document to the printer at 2:17. It stayed in the queue until 2:19, when someone—or something—released it." Aris pointed to the line. "If Vance was already dead, then one of three things happened. The record was altered. Someone stole his credentials. Or somebody entered the study after the murder.”

“And you think the third option is likely?”

“I think the printer doesn’t care what we think.”

Harding gave him a flat look. “You always this pleasant around machines?”

“Only the honest ones.”

On the adjacent monitor, the forensic technician worked through the imaging process. The active server had been disconnected from the office network but not powered down. Every keystroke mattered. Every change to the system could overwrite the trail they were trying to preserve. Aris had insisted on the image before anyone opened the unsent email marked ELARA. Harding had objected at first, impatient with procedure he considered secondary to the existence of a possible lead.

Aris had not moved.

The attachment might contain a confession, a threat, or a private account Vance had no right to possess. It might also be one of the therapy records the killer had weaponized. Opening it without preserving the system would contaminate both the evidence and the trust that had once governed Vance’s practice.

Confidentiality was not a locked drawer to be forced whenever the police became curious. It was a promise made to people at their most exposed.

Once broken, it could not be restored by a court order or an apology.

The technician glanced over. "Image is at eighty-six percent."

A mug sat beside the keyboard, its coffee gone black and cold. Aris reached for it without looking. His fingers struck the handle. Porcelain clattered against the metal desk, and a dark crescent spilled across the paperwork.

Harding watched the tremor in his hand.

"You all right?"

"I'm tired."

"That's not what I asked."

Aris folded a blotting cloth over the spill. "Then ask a better question."

The office beyond the server room had been sealed, but its details remained visible through the frosted partition: the pale geometry of Vance's study, the desk reduced to a blur, the chair angled toward the window. A figure moved on the other side of the glass.

Aris stopped.

"Who's in there?"

Harding turned. The silhouette had vanished.

He opened the door and crossed into the study. "Nobody."

The weak afternoon light lay across the carpet in gray bands. Outside, traffic dragged along the avenue, tires hissing over damp pavement. The printer waited beneath the window, its output tray empty now except for the evidence sleeve containing the strip of paper.

THERAPY IS LISTENING.

Harding checked the doorway, then the window. "Could've been a technician."

"Could have."

"You saw a person?"

"I saw movement."

"That's not the same thing."

"No," Aris said. "It isn't."

The server image completed at 3:04 p.m. Only then did the technician begin extracting the email metadata. The message had never been sent. It had been created at 11:38 the previous night, revised at 12:06, and saved under Vance's account. The attachment carried a date six years earlier.

Aris stared at the filename.

ELARA_0914.pdf

His mouth went dry.

Harding came to stand beside him. "That mean something?"

Aris did not answer immediately. The date was familiar. Not because it appeared in a case file or police report, but because it belonged to the private calendar he had stopped consulting years ago. Elara had disappeared in September. The four digits were the day and month of the anniversary, though the attachment's format could have meant something else.

A coincidence was not evidence. Grief made patterns from dust.

“What is it?” Harding asked.

“My daughter’s name.”

The detective’s expression hardened. “Vance knew about Elara?”

“Many people knew about Elara.”

“Was he one of them?”

Aris looked through the frosted glass toward the empty corridor. “I don’t know.”

The metadata offered little more. The file had been copied from an external drive, not created on Vance’s computer. The drive itself was absent. The email’s recipient field was blank. The body contained a single unfinished line:

I can prove what happened, but not who ordered it.

Below it, an insertion point blinked patiently.

Harding exhaled through his nose. “We open it.”

“Not yet.”

“Why not?”

“Because we don’t know whether the attachment is genuine, planted, or designed to trigger us.”

“It mentions your daughter.”

“That’s exactly why we don’t open it blindly.”

The printer logs produced another inconsistency. The document released at 2:17 had not originated on Vance’s desktop. It had been sent from a device identified only by a temporary network address. The address had connected through the building's guest access point, which should have required a password issued at reception.

Harding called for the building manager. While they waited, Aris examined the queue history. The printed document had been three pages long. Its title field was blank. Its file name had been erased after printing, but one fragment remained in the spool record:

PATIENT—

The rest was missing.

A chime sounded from the technician's workstation.

Not an incoming call. An alert.

The email account had received a new message.

No sender appeared. No subject line. Only an attachment, delivered to Vance's account at 3:11 p.m., less than ten minutes after the server image had been completed.

Harding looked at Aris. "That wasn't there before."

"It was waiting for a trigger."

"Can you tell what the trigger was?"

Aris studied the header. "Someone knows we're in the system."

For a moment, nobody moved. Somewhere in the building, plumbing groaned. A truck shifted gears on the street below, the sound rising through the walls like a mechanical growl.

Harding reached for the mouse.

Aris caught his wrist.

“Don’t.”

The detective looked down at Aris’s hand.

“You’re running out of reasons.”

“I’m running out of time.”

He released him and opened the attachment properties instead. The filename appeared in plain text:

COME ALONE—2:19

Beneath it was a location: the old municipal records annex, closed after a flood and awaiting demolition.

Harding’s eyes narrowed. “That’s a summons.”

“It’s an invitation dressed as one.”

“Same difference.”

“No. A summons assumes the person called has a choice.”

The building manager arrived breathless, followed by a uniformed officer. He claimed no one had been admitted through reception after lunch. The guest access password, however, had been written on a card kept beside the desk. The card was missing.

Harding sent the officer to secure the annex.

Aris remained before the screen. The time in the attachment’s name was not 2:17. It was 2:19—the moment the printer had produced its pages. Someone had built the message around the delayed print, knowing the discrepancy would lead them here.

Knowing, perhaps, that Aris would insist on preserving the server before opening Elara's file.

The killer had not merely left a clue. They had studied his methods.

His phone vibrated.

An unknown number.

He answered without speaking.

For several seconds there was only static, then the low murmur of traffic. A breath touched the line—close, controlled, almost intimate.

"Doctor," a voice said. "You've been very careful."

Aris looked at the frosted glass.

A shadow stood beyond it, motionless.

"Who is this?"

"You already know what happens when you refuse to listen."

The line went dead.

Harding drew his weapon and moved for the door. Aris followed, the corridor stretching white and empty beneath the fluorescent lights. At its far end, the elevator doors slid shut.

For an instant, a hand appeared between them—pale fingers, a dark sleeve.

Then the doors sealed.

On the monitor behind them, the new attachment remained unopened.

COME ALONE—2:19

Aris looked at the time.

2:16 p.m.

Three minutes until the appointment the dead man had left behind.

FINISH

The End

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

karma aryani

This author creates thoughtful books for readers through a focused, AI-assisted publishing workflow.

Published August 18, 2026